Story of a Dwarf's Treasure.

When Christina of Spain was in Rome, about 20 years ago, a dwarf named Georgia Lelli was presented to her. He was full of wit and intelligence, and pleased the queen so much that she attached him to her service. Thanks to her liberality the dwarf was able to accumulate a small fortune, which he left when he died, recently, to two sisters married and living in Aquila. The heirs sent two persons to Paris to receive the gold pieces and bank bills which the Liliptian relative had left them, and these innocent countrymen on their return to Rome were fellow-travellers with three persons who became very friendly with them. The feigned travellers were going, they said, to Alexandria on business of the greatest importance, and were delighted to have found such agreeable companions. When the men of Aquila told them that they carried the heritage of ten thousand dollars in a small valise, one of them said they also had a large sum of money with them, and proposed putting it all together. The countrymen agreed to this novel arrangement, and one of the three travellers took charge of their united treasure until arriving at Turin. There the pretended friends left the train, giving the precious valise into the hands of the Aquilines, and promising soon to return. But they never did, and the deluded countrymen found on examining their valise that the treasure had been replaced by some lumps of lead. When they related their adventure to the police in Rome, it seemed so improbable that they themselves were held in custody until the truth of their story was proved and some trace of the real culprits discovered.

Study to Have Ideas.

A suggestive story being told of the late Joseph Harrison, of Philadelphia, inventor of the sectional boiler for which the Academy of Arts and Sciences awarded him the Rumford medal, and widely known as the partner of Winans in Russian railway contract. He was climbing the Gemmi, in Switzerland, accompanied by a young man, and the conversation fell on the younger man's chance of rising in the world should he embrace the profession of mechanical engineer. Mr. Harrison favored the idea, saying that this was the age of invention and improvement, that machinery was constantly being applied to new uses, and that he who would make it a study and master it in all its forms would never be at a loss to obtain remunerative employment.

"But I have no skill in drawing," said the young man.
"Neither have I," said Mr. Harrison; "I never had time to learn. But I have always found that if I had an idea I could express it on a shingle with a piece of chalk, and let a draughtsman work it out handsome and according to rule. And I've generally had ideas enough to keep three draughtsmen busy. You can always hire draughtsmen, but you can't hire ideas, my boy."
It may be added that Mr. Harrison's success was due not to scholastic advantages, but to native capacity and personal effort.
